Anniversary

Abstract

A fever, a freakout, a lesion-like spot newly risen and the frenzied drive to the clinic for a cheek-swab, negative, on our anniversary no less. Now dozing lover, I promise never to compare this labored breathing with the dusk the cicadas' so-called singing hangs over this day.

by James Crews

and the frenzied drive to the clinic for a cheek-swab,
breathing with the dusk the cicadas' so-called singing hangs over this day. I will make of our useless plague-fear a blanket and drape it across the bare shiver of your shoulders where the last, thinning pages of sunlight stretch like blank vellum. I won't trace celebration or wasted in Vaporub on the faltering rise and fall of your chest. Which is to say, though I have cancelled the reservations and postponed the party, we will make the most of this, make do, and maybe love too, later, if you're in the mood. For now, I will let you seduce me with sleep-sounds that always say, his, his. As long as the cicadas, those noisemakers, keep strumming their complicated timbals into annual need, these twin plastic men holding hands in tuxedos on top of the tiered white cake in the fridge will keep waiting as if for their slow waltz to begin.

James Crews holds an MFA in Creative Writing from the University of Wisconsin-Madison. His work has appeared in Columbia, Prairie Schooner, Crab Orchard Review, Best New Poets 2006 and 2009 as well as other journals. He was the recipient of the 2009 Copperdome Chapbook Prize from Southeast Missouri State Press for What Has Not Yet Left and another chapbook, One Hundred Small Yellow Envelopes, based on the life and work of artist, Felix Gonzalez-Torres, was recently published by Parallel Press. He currently works as a “do-gooder” in Portland, Oregon where he writes almost exclusively about the rain.
