Benison before your Venison, my Dear

Gordon McDermott

Quello infinito e ineffabil bene

What continues from that leastless yeasty body, that sunny-science in the bleb of the 'that', no, —the that— which is directed, like light, to a loved body inductively, indelably, and reductively rendered to be that which had once meant who as in 'Our Father which art in Heaven'

—which body was bread

Urne gedæghwamlican hlaf syle us todæg all the more a remove.

That there is where it lies that which is removed that which which once meant who that is a body of something a corpus, a body, a which which was a whom. Which, or another (that is another which) another body that is a filling for that abstract moral breadth extending into the tongue, chest and loins, in no particular order, after the caesura.

Benediction before the meats.

Our Loin which art before an English bible only ever always was a cut of meat. com'a lucido corpo raggio vene

That body which is induced from —induced, inducted, inductive the thousand some odd years of teutonic fear & trembling on what we haven't acted on, the desire that is piled love on the tongue which is neither remedy or symptom, not that the two are ever always in opposition.

But that, my dear, is the means of time of 'was' and 'will be' or the 'always' and 'ever was' that will always stand aside its referent which, that is who, is shapeless but is, when called to, continually a body an image that is meaning without form a word
a word
a word
and not the cut of tender meat before you.
