Every Night

Lois Harrod
Every Night

Abstract
One stays awake longer than the Other. One listens to the late night talk show, the novelist babbling on

Keywords
poem, one, other, tinnitus
Every Night

by Lois Harrod

One stays awake longer than the Other. One listens to the late night talk show, the novelist babbling on about her ten-year writer's block or the epidemiologist blabbing plague. Or One listens to a book on tape, adventures in Lower Egypt or Nevada, drownings and drinkings. Something dumb because the Other doesn’t want to listen to anything smart, because the Other has tinnitus and needs noise to displace the ringing, and One fears One will have it too, too much noise in her sleep. Even so One listens for the breathing and the snores and the coughs because the Other smoked too long and is still coughing and sometimes One wakes and bends to the Other, like a nurse in a nursing home checking a patient’s hush, those gaps, regular snores and then.

Published by Digital Commons @ Butler University, 2010
nothing,

it's those silences too One hates, wondering what is stalking the heart's blubber, what will steal the Other, what still will give, what still can take.

Lois Marie Harrod's Cosmogony won the 2010 Flyway Hazel Lipa Chapbook contest (Iowa State University) and her Furniture won the 2008 Grayson Press Poetry Prize. Brief Term, poems from 22 years of high school teaching, is forthcoming from Black Buzzard Press in November. Earlier books include Firmament, Put Your Sorry Side Out, Spelling the World Backwards, This Is a Story You Already Know, Part of the Deeper Sea, Every Twinge a Verdict, Crazy Alice and Green Snake Riding. She teaches Creative Writing and supervises student teachers part-time at The College of New Jersey.