Transubstance

Nicole Walker

The word morph sounds so soft but there is tugging and there is pulling. The unsticking of legs from the threads breaks any thoughts of grace.

The newest butterfly just knocked into his neighbor pushing him off his post where he was hanging by one spidery limb. Her next move: unspooling her tongue.
Testing anything—wind, brother, plastic—as edible air.

A proboscis evokes creature not sweet thing. Antennae, bent legs and papery wings do not immediately spell baby breath and sunrise. No. More grasshopper than angel, these butterflies, still, read Acridid more than laridae.

When the locusts came, they came in ugly tornadoes, ripping into entire fields of grass, an acre per second.
A winter's worth of sustenance swirling in an million insects' stomachs. A conversion of mass. Such a frenzy doesn't go unnoticed. The world loves beauty and scar in equal proportion. Seagulls, no one's favorite birds, but saviors nonetheless, enveloped disaster, swallowed winged flutters into their bellies, then rose up, flew again, absorbing them all.

Nicole Walker is the author of This Noisy Egg (Barrow Street Press, 2010).
