Hypnotic White Silk Skylights

Anthony Borruso
Butler University

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.butler.edu/grtheses

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation
https://digitalcommons.butler.edu/grtheses/498

This Thesis is brought to you for free and open access by the Graduate Scholarship at Digital Commons @ Butler University. It has been accepted for inclusion in Graduate Thesis Collection by an authorized administrator of Digital Commons @ Butler University. For more information, please contact digitalscholarship@butler.edu.
Hypnotic White Silk Skylights

by Anthony Borruso

Submitted in Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the Degree of Master of Fine Arts in Creative Writing to the Department of English at Butler University.

May 2018
Name of Candidate: Anthony Borraso

Thesis Defense:

Date: 5/4/18

Committee signatures:

Chris Tucker, Thesis Advisor
Chris Tucker, Thesis Reader
(for Ctec Mevius)

Thesis Title: Hypnotic White Silk Skylights

Thesis Approved in final form:

Date: 5/21/18

MFA Director signature: Dan Banden
Table of Contents

Introduction

1. Natural Selection
Post-Utero Refrain
Mrs. America
Dizzy Boy
Unfathomables
For Solipsism
The Knife
Anxieties
I Want To Be A House
Orange Mazda

2. At The Reception Desk
Evaluation
Blackjack In The Psych Ward
The Hospital
Anatomy
Borrowed Bloom
The Rogue Patient
Revival
Against Solipsism
Pointilism

3. Ode To R. Budd Dwyer
Atavistic Parable
Chiari Malformation
Self-Portrait With An Open Skull
Origami Moth
In Praise Of Forms
Sad Little Anthony
February
Poetry Class
4.
Her Craft 52
Spinning 53
Love-Sloshed Cinema 54
Voodoo Lounge 55
Oh How I Long For Sadness, A Sadness Worse 56
Self-Deprecation 57
The Pet 58
Staten Island 59
Ode To Kalief Browder 61
Ars Poetica 62
Sky Maintenance 64
Cubicle 65
"I'm now making myself as scummy as I can. Why? I want to be a poet, and I'm working at turning myself into a seer. You won't understand any of this, and I'm almost incapable of explaining it to you. The idea is to reach the unknown by the derangement of all the senses. It involves enormous suffering, but one must be strong and be a born poet. It's really not my fault.” — Arthur Rimbaud

“If I feel physically as if the top of my head were taken off, I know that is poetry.”

—Emily Dickinson, Selected Letters

Dickinson and Rimbaud both come to poetry to feel a euphoric and traumatic disassociation from the body, the poem being a place where time collapses in on itself, where contradictions and paradoxes thrive. How else could such a small piece of writing contain ideas so vast and profound? How else could one leave his body, walk around it, learn to love it anew.

*

“In that huge and microscopic career of time, as it were a wild horse racing in an illimitable pampa under the stars, describing immense and microscopic circles with his hoofs on the solid turf, running without a stop for the millionth part of a second until he is aged and worn to a heap of skin, bones and ragged hoofs—”

—William Carlos Williams, Spring and All

In this brilliant passage, the reader is moved with incomprehensible speed—then suddenly stopped dead. Time is confronted as both an eternity and a millionth part of a second. It is as if we were to look at the whole earth and zoom in on the leg of an ant. After having brain surgery this summer, I realized that recovery confuses time in a similar way. Alone in the darkness of my bedroom, I tried to shield myself from overwhelming sights and sounds. Days felt long and short at once. They melted into one another, became vague. Williams’ line was certainly in the back of my mind as I began my poem “Anatomy:” “Lightning / strikes the primordial soup and life / rises / out of the ocean / some billion years later / you have a disease / that makes you / earth-crusted, / water logged.”

*

When I was 18 years old I was hospitalized with an anxiety disorder for two weeks in South Beach Psychiatric Ward at Staten Island Hospital. Afterwards, I dropped out of school and ignored my friends—I wouldn’t leave the house for fear of having a panic attack in public. In that time I didn’t do much beside read, watch movies, and write. I journaled incessantly as if to purge myself of an overflow of feeling. Though what I wrote was often non-sensical and melodramatic, occasionally I’d come upon a line that resounded in a way that made a special kind of sense, a temporary order.

*

“Oh! Blessed rage for order, pale Ramon,
The maker’s rage to order words of the sea,
Words of the fragrant portals, dimly-starred,
And of ourselves and of our origins,
In ghostlier demarcations, keener sounds.”

— Wallace Stevens, “The Idea of Order at Key West”
When I finished my first poetry class the teacher called me into her office. She looked at me with consternation, her eyelids half-lowered, and said, “I’m sorry to tell you this, but you’re a poet.”

A poem is never finished; it is only abandoned. — Paul Valery Sisyphus is a character I’ve always felt great sympathy for. As Camus did, I see him as emblematic of all humans, ceaselessly striving for an apex in the face of certain failure. When his boulder rolls back down he can do nothing but start over, repeat his journey, because all he ever has is his journey. Poetry is a task as Sisyphean as any other. The poem is never perfected but is embarked on by the poet nonetheless. With an unwavering enthusiasm and a curious nature, he must be open to whatever might enter its path. And when the poet inevitably quits the poem, he is met by another white sheet of paper.

Faith is a long commute. — Laura Kasischke, Fire and Water

Trauma and recovery are two things I notice constantly cycling in my life and poetry. I want my poetry to be relentless and resilient. I have ordered my manuscript so that the “I” in my poems recovers from his mental break down only to find out that he has an anatomical abnormality called Chiari Malformation, and that he will need brain surgery. Again, he must recover, again he must hide away for a time in darkness before he can reacquaint himself with light.
“Be stoic when necessary and write—you have seen a lot, felt deeply, and your problems are universal enough to be made meaningful—WRITE.” — Sylvia Plath, The Journals of Sylvia Plath

*

“Much of what is said here, must be said here twice. A reminder that no one takes an immediate interest in the pain of others.” — Billy Collins, “The Blues”

*

Humor is important to me. Especially dark humor, as in my poem “At The Reception Desk,” where the persona tells a “very kind receptionist…to go fuck herself.” Such capricious and amusing shifts of tone hope to engage the reader’s curiosity, to inspire in them a kind of voyeuristic intrigue.

*

I’m interested in things that cycle, things that spin. I want to present the experience of disorientation to the reader: through form, language, and tone. I want to evoke feelings of displacement and chaos. When you feel most overwhelmed by tragedy, I’d like to make you laugh.

*
I love movies. I love reels of film and the warm, fuzzy noise they make. But also, the idea of acting or playing a role interests me. If I’m sick, must I play the victim? If I’m in the psych ward, does this make me psychotic?

*

“Suddenly that’s the thing we can control. We’ll use language to control this and to actually contain our feeling. That way we don’t have to feel. In a certain way, it’s a projection of feeling out of us and onto a wall. It’s a little movie of feeling. We can watch it, but not actually feel it.” —Nick Flynn, Divedapper Interview

*

“Memory takes us where we need to go.” — Waltz With Bashir (2008)

*

Waltz With Bashir is a movie that explores how trauma relates to memory. In it, the director and main character, Ari Folman, interviews fellow veterans of the 1982 Lebanon War in order to track down memories he has lost or blocked out from his time as an Israeli soldier. The movie depicts the soldiers’ memories through a kind of animation that is faithful to their story but conjured up strangely, in brighter lights with wilder colors and surreal touches. I want my poems to function as this does. I want to leave my reader somewhere between a memory and a dream.

*

“Tell all the truth but tell it slant — / Success in Circuit lies”— Emily Dickinson, 1263

*

‘Again I fancy Sisyphus returning toward his rock, and the sorrow was in the beginning. When the images of earth cling too tightly to memory, when the call of happiness becomes too insistent, it happens that melancholy arises in man’s heart: this is the rock’s victory, this is the rock itself. The boundless grief is too heavy to bear. These are our nights of Gethsemane. But crushing truths perish from being acknowledged. Thus, Edipus at the outset obeys fate without knowing it. But from the moment he knows, his tragedy begins. Yet at the same moment, blind and desperate, he realizes that the only bond linking him to the world is the cool hand of a girl. Then a tremendous remark rings out: “Despite so many ordeals, my advanced age and the nobility of my soul make me conclude that all is well…. ” All Sisyphus’ silent joy is contained therein. His fate belongs to him. His rock is a thing. Likewise, the absurd man, when he contemplates his torment, silences all the idols…. The absurd man says yes and his efforts will henceforth be unceasing”—Albert Camus, The Myth of Sisyphus

In this return is where I believe Sisyphus becomes a poet. He has achieved some distance from his woes. Instead of running away from his struggle, he finds himself re-engaging with it just as the poet does on the page. He continues, in spite and in love, to roll his boulder with a renewed sense of urgency. This is why poetry for me is not an escape from my traumas and anxieties but a way for me to, at least momentarily, understand them and how they have forged my identity. In the theatre of the poem I can transform myself. Surgery can be seen as a metaphor. More than cutting through muscles and sawing through bone, poetry has given me a chance to change myself and to heal. To journey up the mountain with renewed vigor, even while knowing I will be knocked back down.
Natural Selection

Oh I am this cordless chordate two holes

for eating and shitting, frenzied, contemplative, picked

last for the football team.
I watch trees slide

slowly, into the sky—
Oh I am a man

lucky to have a headache. I have evolved.

Where do I go from here?
Post-Utero Refrain

Believe you me even the innocent appleseed has cyanide. Kittens have sharp teeth. Obstacles loom as you try to find the bathroom, half-asleep.

Believe you me you walk through life thoughtless as a cauliflower. You throw yourself headfirst into bowling pins. Slide and scrape your knee: bone white before the blood comes.

You watch days pass like accordion buses that never make music. You wonder why kids no longer dance in fire hydrant geysers.

Believe you me you could crack a tooth eating biscotti, or spend a whole morning lost in the back of a cereal box.

Someone told me once that we are all cadavers, or was it flowers that have yet to bloom.
Mrs. America

Every morning: a bowl of oats then off to school: the blood oath, a pledge I fill my fledgling mouth with.

Shiny red apple displayed on your desk like a new Corvette.
The flag drooped solemnly over our low and knowledge-less heads.

O, Mrs America, mother, teacher, lover, money grubber,

I pledge allegiance to you in black high-heeled boots, lustful ruler ready to crack my knuckles, ready to wear them down as a river does a disobedient valley.

You know the lay of the land and make minnows of us:
flicking tails, blurring bodies.

Even as you take attendance my blood boils to steam,
I wonder, do you think of me at recess?

Do you want me dressed in baby blue? My love-sick imperialist, let’s meet up for detention, I’ll soothe the tension in your shoulders.

I’ll take your swollen feet in my hands, Ma’am.
I salute your salacious smile.

Keep gnawing, gnawing that red pen with crooked teeth.
My god—those ink-stained hands.
Dizzy Boy

He lived life like an oven timer:
the world winding, friends and teachers whirling round his desk. Stay still,

he'd whisper, to notebooks, atoms, planets, crickets. He reached for a cookie and missed. The compass inside him was broken. Dizzy boy had a lizard that wouldn't stop chasing its tail. He was twelve and lost as anyone who's been twelve, wanting to slow the blades of this fan, to find a switch. Smelling the earth-thick stench of unstemmed buds, seeing their sticky glisten, he decided to roll up a joint.

This didn't stop the spinning; instead he felt himself lifting and just as his feet left the grass, a door opened up in the sky:

bees funneled out, honeycombed his insides.
Unfathomables

A chimney swift skims with its beak then its body this merging of water and light, leaves

a cloud of soot in the lake.

I ask dad why
I can’t have candy. Why that boy is brown. Why grass shivers in the wind, why the wind moves but is bodiless. Dad, dad…

Scatter your rhythms in the bog, young mud puppies. You!
Go tickle the beard of a jellyfish,
I don’t have time for this—

Water stirs.
In everyone. In me.
In everyone in me. What happens when the moth’s wings throw its breath against goldenrod.

Dad has a badge, a big silver badge.
Heavy in my hand. I’d like to be dad, dad and his badge and his gun, his gun, his little silver bullets.

Towers collapsing in on themselves.
A little obelisk in a big cemetery.

Capillaries reach toward touch. Limbs sift through dreams. Flesh, flesh. This prison of acanthus flutings. My father the tree coaxed me back, loved me as his roots love the dirt. To have bread and breath keeps us tethered to the whipping post. What are these feelings from under my toenails. Why does the dog speak with his tail.

For the first time I am disappointed in my father.

He came home
    crying I didn’t know he could cry, dad, with his badge and his gun, wearing a cloud of dust, dust of fathers, the fathers that didn’t come home.

So much dust even night could not wash him.
For Solipsism

everything is a metaphor for how alone you are enter a room
the size of daylily’s mouth film smooths itself
onto a screen
this is what you see a hand and behind it a brilliant silver
cityscape, skyscraper-syringes filling clouds with black
leave the room
walk down the street
past the bodega
past the butcher's shop its hanging meat
walk to the edge of the circle god drew around you
never get there
The Knife

The knife wants to cut into you metaphorically—like a lover or therapist. It sniffs around your wrist and up the white underside of your arm.
It knows the petty gripes
you have with your body, the vague marks
you’ve made upon it.
The knife looks at you, clinically, tensely, gauging the color of your remorse, measuring the dimensions of dreams you lug to bed each night in a burlap sack.
You deserve each other.

Look at its body curled in your hand, its coy glint.
You feel dilated in its sliver of mirror, you believe in its power, a treasure hides behind night’s eye,

the knife says,
gouge it out.
Anxieties

I am scared, that’s all you need to know. Whether it’s the flash-flood that gets me or the rebel organ, the inside man plotting my demise in the space beneath my ribs, doesn’t matter. The lions will make of me a triptych. My head, torso, and legs will each arrive at different parties in the same clothes. No one will know of my misdeeds, of the guilt hiding under this scarf. Linden Tree, Basset Hound, I could have done better, been more careful. Mudflats where has your hair gone? I’m packing pistils and stamens, I’m dangerous, ripe with love and greased like a mud puppy. I’m vulnerable and lonely. Venison is too gamey. Does the strangler fig know what I did, will he tell my mom and dad and brothers. Does he play bridge with grandpa?
I Want To Be A House

These days my gait is strange, my back cracks, my ribs ache.
This business of being in a body is so tiresome. I can feel the chemicals shifting: failure has its own physiology.

Suicide is not an option,
not with this butter knife, but I can hide inside

a ring of caution tape four feet thick, and if friends try to visit, beat them away with a stick. Look, my fist is missing knuckles, my teeth and mind—have gaps.

How did I get here?
A wilted disgrace, I trace back the family tree to see where this Benedict Arnold skeleton came from.

I wonder sometimes why

I’m so hard on myself, but better to hate what you are than what you want to be.

I want to be a house
on a dead-end street
with a dumb beard of ivy crawling up my face.

And on the kitchen counter,
a jar for leftover change.
Orange Mazda

paranoid sky repurposed the coke can became a pipe and the Mazda a rocket as we were high high and found there one spot of blackness in blackness in blackness and there the island choked blue the island of me the island of you and through the window and the wispy words just barely we could see a swing teetering ghost child a chain of linked steel and stop-watches and there a casket filled with ellipses 2.
At The Reception Desk

after billions of years of natural selection and a few sleepless nights my father drives me to the hospital in a minivan and brings me to a very kind receptionist whom I tell to go fuck herself I am hardly in the mood to be somewhere so sanitary white walls water cooler a television in each corner through the front glass I see parked cars and trees drooling sap I remember me there five-legged and scared scuttling between rows of wood-framed chairs and the room’s chiaroscuro

the me who tries to wipe away the shakes the me in the midst of a crisis one moment a waxwing singing to myself the next a moth caught in light I crack into a jackal blaze into Johnny Rotten this hospital is a piss-stain and how dare they pinned to the lepidopterist’s table I pray for a way out no they say I beg I apologize to mom and dad and God fuck you I wail amorphous un-specied as a tall man in a white coat with fingers like spiders props open my mouth and fills it with polished rocks ambered insects little pills
Evaluation

How do you feel about your diagnosis?
I could take or leave it.

Do you sometimes find it difficult to breath?
Only when clouds stoop to eavesdrop on my conversations.

Whose lungs are tied to my string?
There are no lungs, there is no string.

Breath Balloons?

Not yet.

What faith do you consider yourself to be?
I have no faith in anything but the coyote’s howl

Where is my cloud?

Where is the face of the dragon blood tree?
Soon, soon sings the snake

Who put this lotus in my chest?
Yes, yes…

Is it my breath?
Yes.

Is it your breath?
Don’t rob the sky of that kite.

And what of the moth?
He flies in the cave of your mouth, blows kisses toward your teeth.

Is doubt like a branch? Is hope like a sieve?
Breathe into my flower-chest.

What flavor is heaven?

Bring me back to gills.
Blackjack In The Psych Ward

what are the odds  she and I 18 fast friends having lived lives separated  by only a few streets as I shuffle  cut the deck deal to her in this house of wailing stomping swallowing whatever she tells me about her dad his hard hand  hanging from a phone cord in the coat closet

I tell her  about how I inhaled visions of a busted sun with bloodshot eyes  the moon cracking to plaster bits  she turns over her card  bright red slashed across her wrist  I never talked to girls like her at school  white skin eyes black with shadow  never read poems or felt a chill at the top of my spine like a music made by ghosts  I wish I could give her something besides conversation double down  ditch this deck what if she pressed  her scars against my cheek  what if we buried our pasts here together under these white walls under this discarded pile  as some other lucky patients form a line  and wait to be dealt a kind of communion

The Hospital

Apparitions pass through walls, appear to me as I lie in my moon-gown, the quilted squares of my hospital dress.
In the cafeteria, I see them, swirling angels above the tables,
hypnotic white silk skylights.
I tell them I am
scared my soul is sliding out of my body.
I am trying to hold it, my soul, to press it down, farther than even my feet.

Joe, in his gown, wants to know my name, a beard bristling up his cheeks like creepers on a trellis.
Milosz with his foggy glass face and his meth teeth.
Mandy with her red wrapped wrists.
Everything else gray:
gowns, walls, half-smiles,
nurses, ping-pong table.
Gray and muddled, as I forget, as I make more space in me.

I wait by the phone. It hasn’t rung, it won’t ring, it only makes calls.
But I wait to hear
the voice of God, and he’s mad, so mad that dahlias crack through linoleum, bloom into pink mouths of jagged teeth and the scent of burnt black resin.
Anatomy

Lightning
strikes the primordial soup and life rises
out of the ocean,
some billion years later you have a disease
that makes you
earth-crusted,
water logged,
bed-ridden
chewing over a dream.
Mirror the motion—
sick mollusk
grasping at the shore, winter gnawing at its shell.
Follow
the lamp faced fish
into the abyss.
Listen
to fiddler crabs singing, how slippery is this mingling
of saliva and soul?
There is no answer
but silence

in the riverbed.
As you spit the pits

of cherries,
    little sanguine seeds,
up into night’s mouth, think about your bones,

how they have nothing to do with death.
Borrowed Bloom

O flower breather, lovely green-thumbed
Goddess of mud hills, take my body
And make of it what you will.

Elusive duchess, give me a skull of soil,
Earthworms, water, light.

Unroll the scroll of my tongue.
Then be on your way.

It is summer and everything a garden.
I can be a garden.

Seedlings, sprout from my chest.
Feet, go green with moss.
Brook, I will breach your sheen.

No fee to climb trees,
No fault-lines in the forest.
Brood, brood, you thirsty roots.

I know this weight, this wait. This pressure in my head comes from a great thought.

Lover, dig your spigot into me, twist
The nozzle, what a wonderful liquid!

My toes roam through loam,
My clothes are off, I do not blush.

I drink the ink from deep, deep.
I think so long crickets hush, words weary.

A bud bloomed in the back of my throat.
Now, nothing but a few crispy leaves.

It is a cold time. My books turn blue.
The Rogue Patient

I haven’t been happy since the hospital. One hall and a flock of nurses, their faces, crow’s feet and white eyes over smokestack scrubs. Sorry for them, I’d ask about their days, their kids, their weekend plans. I sat by the window with one, looking out into the parking lot at stray weeds straining through cement, asking if this was a form of punishment or of help, she told me, a little bit of both. At night we would line up for meds, I thought about the movies, the rogue patient who pretends to swallow, sweeping the mind medicine under the tongue. I swallowed though. The brain glazed over, the mind muddled grey. As a nurse squinted at my open mouth, pity billowed out in clouds.
Revival

Where are the heads quieted on pikes?
Where is the crooked steel smirk of the guillotine.
How coarse this kiss of life: lungs inflate, cheeks flush,
even the coldest corpse throbs with pulse.

Strung up anew,
in saggy garb,
he speaks in a foreign tongue:

Rest is not what rest used to be.
He would prefer the earth’s belly.
His hands, gone so long stiff,

writhe upon the page,
his desk becomes a ribcage.
Against Solipsism

I always wanted to be alone, a dark dot
on a white page.

Noiseless, sexless, I kept kisses on the threshold of my lips. I was a birch branch teetering in wind.

Then winter came to crust the streets. Trees slouched.

The sun turned peach.

Slate faced strangers
passed me, smiling, frowning, wearing whatever expression
I imposed on them.

Like a dusting of snow
swallowed by a blizzard, that’s the taste
of realization: all this white connects us. Silence clings to the world:

a boy lying on a field
of dried husks,

the hound dripping rabbit’s blood in the spruce’s understory, one cloud smeared

on an unspeakable sky.
Pointilism

Okay Seurat, Seurat of the dots, the spots splotched over and over like cells of the body but brighter, softer. The Channel of Gravelines—a name too bumpy for the subdued scene smoothed out and along the harbor.

This mist of white and blue makes the mind gray, reminds me of the hospital where I, the “I” I am now, was born and not from the dark skin of my summery mother. Where was born in me, a new eye, seeing weighed by too much seeing.
3.
Ode To R. Budd Dwyer

To have two mouths, one for singing and one for screaming bloody murder—

this is what the poet strives for, to speak from the temples. Still, I promise no spectacle,

I will not make of me a puzzle, a humptydumpty-put-back-the-pieces affair.

So I’ve spent some months groaning in the dark, sinking into an ossuary couch. So I sit on the stoop staring at distressed brick homes. Grant me these indulgences, this leftover thought reheated in the microwave of the mind:

maybe I will not mend. Is it melodramatic if some days I come home and hang my skull and skin on the coatrack.

If some nights I dream up a man’s busted bust seeping lingonberry jam.

If I have a kind of morbid admiration for R. Budd, his moxie and his manners, how before he blew his brains out—he stepped back and pleaded, Please, please, leave the room if this will…

if this will affect you.
Atavistic Parable

Is not the infinite made of the finite, and the impossible of the possible, thus it seems likely, the slow un-hunching of men’s backs.

I’d like to cry a big cry,

but won’t risk the headache.
Feeling too much brings them on.
It’s like that infinite monkey metaphor, “almost surely”

I would get a headache, just as the monkey

would type Hamlet.
Move on to the Bible
and the Odyssey, this poem, then stare at the sky dazed feeling utterly alone

as I do, sipping my black coffee, scratching my head like a chimpanzee.

Chiari Malformation

This affliction—a ticked-off horse that would hoof me in the teeth.

That’s wrong.

Chiari’s not so blunt. Not with a name like that. She lies low, a snake in a field, feeling her way toward my body. She sinks her fangs in my flesh, the venom cold and slow.

The brain is a flower, the skull a too-small pot, so roots spill over its sides.

When a hermit crab gets too big for its shell, it finds a new one.

Or dies.

Imagine fifty-two clowns stuffed in a Fiat.

Chiari Malformation is a neurological condition. The brain, not fitting properly into the skull, is pushed into the foramen magnum (or spinal canal).

Foramen: a hole or passage, especially in bone.

Magnum: a thing of a type which is larger than normal.

Imagine the thickness of a deck of cards, that’s how far my brain breaches my skull.

Is this why I can’t get “Under Pressure” out of my head?

Sometimes it feels like a balloon inflating inside—pushing into my eyes and ears, pushing down on my neck.

Sometimes it feels as though there’s a boy in there trying to beat his way out.

Sometimes it feels as though I’m the boy, balancing myself as the world spins like a Queen record.

My friend Eric had a full-bred King Charles Cavalier who was chronically ill and would exhibit a strange behavior, “fly biting,” chomping at air as though to catch a cloud in his mouth.

95% of King Charles Cavaliers have Chiari Malformation.

Sometimes I feel like a symptom of my symptoms.

In a dream I was spinning the earth on my finger like a basketball.
I was Sisyphus kicking a boulder the size of my head up a mountain.

At first MRI’s are nerve-wracking. Your head is fed slowly into a white mouth, then knocking sounds start: a construction site peristalsis turns into a techno rave. The noises penetrate and stop, then start again.

Some people have Chiari but no symptoms. Others barely function. I am somewhere in between.

I don’t like to feel bad for myself.

I wish my hardships were made from stone and asphalt. Not pebbles clunking around in my head. No one can see my suffering, no one can hear the whispers: something’s wrong, something’s wrong, something’s wrong…”

In “Going Down Slowly,” Howlin' wolf sings: “You know I done enjoyed things that kings and queens will never have. In fact, kings and queens can never get, and they don't even know about.”

I am a long, luscious fuse. I am a dog tied to a post out of sight. I am a cartoon maiden roped to train tracks by a mustachioed villain and death is coming.

50% of Chiari surgeries leave the patient symptom free.

It is the summer of my surgery. I am obsessed with puzzles, those 1,000 piece behemoths. I wake up, slink down to the basement where the tiny fragments are spread upon the table like misshapen constellations. I feel less dizzy with something to hone in on. This one is of The Wizard of Oz, Dorothy and Company on the yellow brick road.

In Stand By Me, four boys follow a train track searching for the body of a boy their age. The track is a poignant metaphor pushing them towards something: death? adulthood? a busted skull beside a walnut tree?

River Phoenix died eight years after it was filmed. At the time he was more famous than Leonardo DiCaprio. In the movie, his character, Christopher Chambers, is pegged to become a degenerate like his brother and father before him.

Instead he becomes a lawyer. He dies trying to break up a fight in a fast foot restaurant. Is that his fate following him?

20% of Chiari surgeries leave the patient worse off.

After a while, the MRI noises become amorphous, your consciousness starts to dissolve: you find yourself sitting on a swing by a lake at night. The moon is inside the lake. You think about swimming to it. Then you do.
I’m tired of feeling trapped in my head.

I drink two cups of coffee and I’m reeling. The dog of my mind roves. Cars and stoplights and people blur.

Today is the day they will saw through my skull.

I have an obsession with dead actors.

This is my train track: wooden, rickety, beside it a dead deer splayed. I have been walking and I am walking. It is sunny. Maybe I will go back to bed. Maybe I will walk right off the end of the earth.
Self-Portrait With An Open Skull

How cold this room, how baby blue the sheets as I shiver myself to sleep.
I want to remember what it was like: face-down: scalpels, forceps, hands,
intruding on a dream,
saws, clamps, breaking in to bone, the white theatre.

A hole in me, how cold
the clamp, how taut the skin.
Sing, sing bone-saw, open the passage my thoughts walk, the frosted back-alleys of the brain, the seedy side-streets with plastic bag tumbleweeds, an anesthesia dream.

Godly cinematographer,
get that dolly shot in the subway, show a rat trekking a slice of pizza down the tracks. This is where one goes when the lights go out, when sterile gloves tread deep in the soul, this is where the metronome of the mind is.

Then a waking, soft and slow like walking in the corridor between two lives. The lights dim.
A projector flickers and I see how the bone saw let the light pour in—sawdust, stardust, thought rust.
I see the surgeon’s hands and the paper moth
which he pulls from my skull.
Origami Moth

Hands,
    as if flown from a dream,

    shape
the larval pinwheel, the square cocoon.

Sound of a match
    flickering.

Sound of a forest burned down—that kind of quiet.

An illusion of geometry.

Paper folded over and in to itself.

As if flown from a dream:
    silk fingers:
the moth becoming more a moth,
    thirsty
for symmetry,
    thirsty for light.
In Praise Of Forms

you wait for the sky
to exhale purple

and pungent birds you wait for the ocean to sweep

its hands full of ambergris and piss you wait

to become the patient blanketed in welts

and bedpan wetness
watching through a window

the slow drip of days soon you will pry

diamonds from your teeth soon you will climb

the rungless
celestial ladder to night her gasping hips

and lunar womb speak

she'll say to the ampersand what will it tie you to light is almost ready to spread itself over the trees and dirt and mossy stones the bullfrogs elastic throat you wait in the theatre begging for whispers

praying for forms.
Sad Little Anthony

look at you, hardly an outline in this dark room, this dark time of recovery. poor little anthony,

they cut you up good:
a bit of skull, a slice of spine.
you’ve draped beach towels

over the blinds, you sink into a black lake. let sleep smooth you like a zamboni

over scarred ice, let darkness scrub the blood from your head.
when dad’s spoon goes clink, clink, in a bowl and the whole world quivers with clinks, crawl into yourself, shivering, skinny, hungry, here, let’s fill you with oxtail soup and oxycodone, poetry and sympathy. poor

anthony, clench your teeth.
no one feels so bad for you as you, and that makes us sad.
February

In my twenty-fifth year

All I know of the present moment is how it bends into the next one, like the jackdaw flapping through daybreak, like footprints in the snowstorm turned toward the shed. I watch the scurrying of my neighbor’s Pomeranian, a black poof-ball drifting toward the fence. A husband hurries his son into the idling SUV. A tetherball hangs limply on its post. It feels like I’ve lived my whole life looking through this window at how the day’s drudge pieces into the year’s. A shadow like a scythe curves from the bedroom door. I am between families. The teapot looses an undulating whistle. The lease is up in a month.
Poetry Class

We’d fill in our circle, fluorescent lights buzzing, chatter and clatter breaking the room’s silence, the windows open to twilight. You were there, love, gauze-filled chipmunk cheeks (your wisdom teeth extracted). Then the teacher, her pale face and cigarette scented, black leather jacket, bustling through the door. I had no idea what poetry was, but I wanted sunflowers and milkweed, and to conjure whatever music grapples into being. We started with words, our favorite ones: mail-slot, melancholy, string, ceiling, bronze, poppies. Put those in a poem, she said, and I did.
4.
Her Craft

A bud is hatched, a flower wilts.
She tends to what grows inside her—seeds, prayers, storms.
If she doubts, she doubts that the dead have names still lodged in their throats.
It’s arithmetic: $x - x =$ everything. Even as the tropical storm is provoked to a hurricane, even as God blinks and her brother drops dead—everything is always even. This infuriates her.
She swallows some bittersweet words, then shuts herself.
She becomes a container made of 37 trillion cells (just big enough to hold a poem).
Spinning

Los Angeles, between rolling hilltops and the city’s halo of light, we stood at Griffith Observatory, in coats, for the wind was whipping darkness into an overwhelming thought: perhaps this spinning will not stop. Love, I felt the earth’s orbit; felt the centrifugal pull when we looked at Foucault’s Pendulum, a cannabis kind of confusion. You spoke:

fuck, it’s beautiful up here, and I nodded.

There we were, two hopeless losers perched at the edge of a bird bath city, scared and alone, wingless, when I wound an arm around you it seemed obvious: the spinning wouldn’t stop, the soul is circular, how else to explain the turning of desire into touch.

Love-Sloshed Cinema

I want you laced in celluloid—the script torched, tossed—
This is not an act. It’s love as we learned it. Technicolor big band: burly trombones.

I want you laced in tempestuous trumpets, a slicked-back Sinatra deepening night’s hues.

This is not an act, it’s love;

umbrella-less, rain-drenched, Gene Kelly stomping down the wet set,
I want you. Laced in celluloid, intoxicated, both of us, ruthlessly ransacked, a deep-cut red dress, not an act. I want love, Love, sliding from a string quartet as we melt into melodrama and gin.

I want you laced in celluloid—
this is not an act it’s love.
Voodoo Lounge

Past bayou bungalows and one way signs, past trees with beards
of Spanish moss stuck in the low-down earth, out by the brackish waters of Lake Pontchartrain—beside a boarded up glass factory—
In a neon-signed hive I’m hunched at a high top in the low light of a jazz club.
My red-lipped, black silk mistress givin’ me lip as I drag on Chesterfields, as a bass line walks in beside some wobbly chords.
From the murk, my man’s schizophrenic horn section. Voices like ash trays and match music crackle from the brims of fedoras. I say to her, this ain’t no Abbot and Costello misunderstanding.
I’m in a bad mood,
I got bold thoughts and hot palms pressed in my pockets.
She sips her highball and sighs.
I got one body and all this desire drumming in my chest.
Is it rabbit season or maggot season?
Let me dupe death another night, give me one more Malagueña.
Sweet cemetery of trombones wailing and broke men bobbing their heads, damning their luck; sweet cemetery of blooming moonflowers, and a rhythm that knocks me senseless, tenseless, where I take my cue
from a witch doctor with an alto sax, to let my soul off its leash, to sink a few feet deeper.
Oh How I long For Sadness, A Sadness Worse

than the willows’, worse than what toads know in their slate homes. I want to understand the wind’s thrashing, to become one with it.
Plastic bags, cracked beer bottles, shredded skins of tires, I feel warm just thinking of you there, discarded on asphalt, while a pain like a bow through a violin hurts me, beautifully.
Self-Deprecation

You would write this poem.
Your gimmicks
are a dew-less grass, yellow and stale. Onion or no onion you would cry in the kitchen, loosing doubts on the blender and the bendy straws you never use.
There is a room
in your house, a guest room, whose emptiness
you celebrate: the made bed, the sleek metal lamp,
a burgundy rug with hidden wine stains. You jerk off here four times a day.
It is a safe place, a toehold that gnaws at your foot.
The Pet

An old woman in a house full of ferns has no one to talk to so buys a parrot. She feeds him the only food he will eat, fried meatballs. At the kitchen counter, she shapes the spheres of flesh, whistling, fingers slick with grease. The parrot serenades her in a brisk baritone. “My little Titto Gobbi,” she says to him, his red-feathered chest puffed proudly, “one day we will leave this place, one day I will take you back to the homeland.”

At twilight, the woman ascends a stepping stool and curls her bony feet upon an oversized perch. With knees bent, she chatters to the setting sun. One eye shuts and she dreams of the Amazon, of soaring over opaque green pools. The parrot, snug in her king-sized bed, dreams of walking among the villas of Campania; breathes the robust scent of puttanesca. Nel cielo manca un angelo, he asks a black-eyed contessa as she passes.
Staten Island

Island of buzzcuts, fades, and tape-ups, nail parlors, tanning salons, pizzerias that sell by the slice. Island of callery pears that bloom and stink of bad sex, Honda Civics, paint-chipped handball courts, Arizona tallboys.

Island of roaches and joints, ice cream trucks singing, slinging oxycodone. Island of stained glass churches, false awakenings: dullards staking claims on a post-life, jesus at a juice bar, flaking flaxseed in his smoothie, downing shots of wheatgrass. Hipster island, Guido island, black island, white island, island of my dad’s a cop, it won’t happen again, officer. I take two trains and a ferry to work island. Island of suburban bliss, as south as you can get in this city, driver’s license suspended, mother-in-law rear-ended, football captains flunking trade school.

Island of callused hands and radioactive parks, panicked teachers praying for a pay raise, slate-faced junkies, pin-striped suits at yacht clubs clinking drinks with amnesiac immigrants. Glass-lipped island, blue-ache island, island of don’t park in front of my house, peach-glow alcove island, late night bocci ball island, rickety boardwalks and salty breezes, crushed four lokos.

Island of the osprey perched on the highest branch at Gateway beach.
Island of nervous break-downs, a city that thinks its a small town, the forgotten borough, Staten Italy, island of the white-tailed doe and the candelabra-capped buck. Island of I’ll never come back, island of I always come back.

Island of second chances. Island of my love, her woeful hips, our lip-locked afterglow.
Ode To Kalief Browder

What’s the point of wanting if not to want conflagration, want to burn this city down to a foot of soot. The want man has smoldering in the boiler of his loins, woman, in the blue fire of her womb. You tally each dank day in the clank of a run-on sentence; tending to the sapphire garden that flares in your chest.
You innocent slice of soul,
the watering can in your hands, your deracinated feet so used to roots. They say if you’re to lose, lose loud, like the moth crisped black in the mouth of night’s one light, too bright, but O, Kalief, how you needed to be kissed, how you needed to be swallowed.
This poem strolls through the blue antiseptic halls of the Children’s Hospital, rousing the sick to sew capes to their gowns and crown their heads with wreaths of rosemary.

This poem is taller than it looks on T.V.—I met this poem at the Met Gala and mistook it for an obelisk in a suit, clinking flutes of Pérgnon with Obama.
Even in small talk its voice was thick as a redwood and sensual enough to stir the loins of a dentist. Still, this poem thrives in solitude, disappearing into the woods for weeks with nothing but a flint and a canteen.

This is the origin of its horde of images, in which one sees the heron hovering before its beak impales the shell of a crab, releasing sweet meat and river-sighs. This poem seeks an opening in the pines to view the orange fist of the sun spreading its fingers.

This poem expresses itself so that the owl swallows his name, it coaxes the house-cat back from the maple. It lands the plane safely in a lavender field, then kisses each passenger on the navel.
This poem is modest as the sea who kneels to the sun, the sea always falling back into herself. O poem!

  How lowly you make me,
  how brashly you cast your shadow!
Sky Maintenance

Never trust an orchid.

Never lock eyes with a maple.

If there is snow on the ground, never should you speak of spice-plants or ace bandages.

Take things slow,
allow every day
to seep into the sky:
an empty jar filling
with honeyed light.

Love in every direction at the same time.

Love until the whole world buzzes like a grapefruit.

Patient, white, cold.

Listen to the wind moving through trillions of invisible strings.

Ice glistens on the highest branches of trees beside the highway. The road glimmers.

You glimmer.

Quick, whisper a secret.

Always speak tongue first.

Give praise to the snail’s trail, how he goes on feeling
as it goes on following.
Cubicle

No tie noosed round my throat, no attaché case at the end of my arm like an anchor. I’m just the boy my mother measured on the closet door, the one who swallowed a handful of pomegranate seeds and was made to stay in this body twelve months out of every year. No cubicle assigned to me except for this bone-box my brain came in, ivory confine of the mind; if I must go to the office—give me a mahogany desk and plant it out by the pines, top it with moss and scotch decanter. Let there be a mail-boy blooming acne, a secretary sheathed in primrose. Conferences of blackbirds and that great machine the sky pumping out its endless blue until up on a rope comes the moon.

Sure, this job might be a dead-end, but when I clock out I’ll exit through a door in the grass.