You, Reader

by Billy Collins

I wonder how you are going to feel when you find out that I wrote this instead of you, that it was I who got up early to sit in the kitchen and mention with a pen the rain-soaked windows, the ivy wallpaper,

and the goldfish circling in its bowl.

Go ahead and turn aside, bite your lip and tear out the page, but, listen-- it was just a matter of time before one of us happened to notice the unlit candles and the clock humming on the wall.

Plus, nothing happened that morning-- a song on the radio, a car whistling along the road outside-- and I was only thinking about the shakers of salt and pepper that were standing side by side on a place mat.

I wondered if they had become friends after all these years or if they were still strangers to one another like you and I who manage to be unknown and known to each other at the same time-- me at this table with a bowl of pears, you leaning in a doorway somewhere

near some blue hydrangeas, reading this.

How to Read a Poem

by Julie Patterson

Readers and writers have strong - and disparate - opinions about the "right" way to read a poem. Worse yet, there's wide disagreement among accomplished and highly educated poets, too. There's really only one point we all agree on - poems are meant to be read aloud. Beyond that, it gets dicey, but here are some things to consider.

Former poet laureate Billy Collins says, "Obviously, poems come in lines, but pausing at the end of every line will create a choppy effect and interrupt the flow of the poem's sense. Readers should pause only where there is punctuation, just as you would when reading prose, only more slowly."

Look at the text of his poem "You, Reader" (at left) as you listen to him read it, and you'll see what he means.

Billy Collins reads "You, Reader"

Yet poet Georgia Heard says, "...after every single line, my voice is going to stop a little-because in poetry, blank space means silence" (For the Good of the Earth and Sun).

Clearly other poets agree with Heard. Read Gwendolyn Brooks' poem "We Real Cool" below, pausing at the end of each line and stanza.

We real cool. We

Lurk late. We Strike straight. We

Sing sin. We Thin gin. We

Jazz June. We Die soon.

You can also click here to listen to Brooks read her poem (and tell what inspired it):

Gwendolyn Brooks - We Real Cool

This poem sounds very different when read as Brooks does, with pauses at the end of each line, instead of as Collins suggests, to the punctuation only.

So if brilliant poets like Billy Collins and Gwendolyn Brooks don't agree, what are we readers to do?

I say it is not a cut and dry either/or decision. You should consider punctuation, line breaks and white space as your guides. In fact, that's one of the many reasons why you should read a poem aloud more than once (especially before reading it to a class or audience). You have to get a feel for it, let the poem sort of emerge in its own rhythm. I believe the "right" way to read a poem evolves as you become more familiar with it.

Most importantly, I'd encourage you to loosen up your belief that there is a right way to read a poem. Just as every dramatic script is subject to a director's interpretation, and as every jazz standard is personalized by each musician, every poem is interpreted and personalized, too. The fact that each of us can look at the same text and see/hear it differently is what makes these genres special. It's why remakes and tribute albums are popular in music, why my husband owns three DVD versions of the same Batman story, and why I'll go see a Shakespeare play every time the Indiana Repertory Theatre produces one-because a slight variation in presentation can help us discover or appreciate something new in the printed text.

As long as you're reading poems aloud, staying true to the exact words the poet chose, and using something about the poem's structure to guide your voice through the lines, you're doing it right.
