Tommy O’Rourke

Distilled crystals
in the fine print.

A boy with transparent skin speaking in ellipses as black snow falls
from his outstretched fingers.

He asks:

Do the stars feel
themselves burning?

The roar of lava spewing through new rifts of breaking glaciers.

His tongue becoming rusted to the roof
of his warm mouth.

Sitting in a bathtub of blue
paint, he hums
at random, and
plugs every pore with planets:
everyday worlds
made solely to betray the silent agenda.
