QUESTION ON A STREET-CAR

JACK KILGORE

“What do tired-eyed people live for?
They seem to have no joy.”
“They have their joys the same as we;
Be silent, little boy.”

I saw a fat, grotesque-nosed cook
    With large and restless feet,
A loose and restless moving mouth
    And eyes that held defeat.

“What do tired-eyed people live for?
    They seem to have no joy.”
“They have their joys the same as we;
    Be silent, little boy.”

I saw a tired stenographer
    With every curl in place,
And her expression painted on
    Her lined and aging face.

“What do tired-eyed people live for?
    They seem to have no joy.”
“They have their joys the same as we;
    Be silent, little boy.”

I saw exhausted laborers;
    Their shoulders drooped, their eyes
Watched dully for their streets. They almost Lacked the strength to rise.

“What do tired-eyed people live for?
    They seem to have no joy.”
“They have their joys the same as we;
    Be silent, little boy.”

I did not see my father’s face
    That held its share of pain.
I did not see his tired eyes
    But turned and asked again,

“What do tired-eyed people live for?
    They seem to have no joy.”
“They have their joys the same as we;
    Be silent, little boy.”
