1-17-2014

Three Poems

Carolyn Stice

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.butler.edu/booth

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://digitalcommons.butler.edu/booth/vol6/iss1/3

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @ Butler University. It has been accepted for inclusion in Booth by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @ Butler University. For more information, please contact omacisa@butler.edu.
Three Poems

Abstract
Three poems: "Where are the words?," "Here I Am," and "Tear My Stillhouse Down."

Keywords
poetry

Cover Page Footnote
"Three Poems" was originally published at Booth.
Where are the words?

For what makes a father hold his child down by her windpipe to lay his belt over the length of her body, or a mother sit by, hear, and take a moment to spin tales of her own grief she will later use in her own defense.

For the space between a child of your own and one not, where an ounce more sympathy should live, but does not.

For the grandmother, who chooses to re-draw her life, for three children who are not her blood, or the weight she feels at putting her own child last because some crimes cannot be forgiven.

If there are shapes for these things, they are poison warnings, yellow tape marked “Police line do not cross,” and tiny labels that say “Hazard, may cause choking.”

They are the smell of the slaughterhouse at dawn, just as the first blood hits the floor, mixing with yesterday’s bleach, the scent of adrenaline passing from one cow to the next.
Here I Am

Here I am: Staring at someone else’s shit in the toilet. Those skid marks sliding up the side, that no amount of flushing can kill and me the only one willing to wield that nasty brush. Here I am knee-deep in the sour-milk smell of laundry the dryer broken and the wet clothes freezing stiff on the line.

I want a life, less complicated by shit. I want your body and my body in a late summer wheat field, just us and the geese overhead, honking their way south. I want the bite of winter to be a little less keen. I want a space for melody and poetry where Adam Zagajewski and the Pixies can riff on the life of the soul and I can fit my mouth against the curve of your ear, for however long it takes to unwind our sorrow. I want the scent of mint to linger around me after you are gone rushing off to whatever it is you do with your day. When it is still I listen for your voice. I am hollow. I am tripping all over myself all over that invisible line we cannot cross.

Tear My Stillhouse Down
The press of leg against knee brings me back to my body call it longing my eyes on the flat of your wrist
I want to feel the scrape of it against my thigh
I imagine the women you date the fullness of their lips
The shape of their ear lobes your long fingers around their calves
This is not a love poem I have been in love am in the hollow of love where you hear your own breath echo against canyon walls again and again

I do not want you in the night when my body folds under the weight of day I want wide afternoon when we can languish together in midday light sinews and muscles sliding smooth against bone the shimmering edges of touch making us loose in our skin

My throat is raw from pushing desire back down
I want it to be the grey-green color of bile but the heat on my skin names it the crimson of July tomatoes picked at their peak

Carolyn Stice is currently working on her PhD in Creative Writing at UT Knoxville, where she is managing editor for their graduate literary magazine Grist. She has a particular interest in the work of female poets, especially that which deals with the landscape of the body.