PATENTSPEAK: A NEW LOGOPUTIAN LINGO

MICHAEL KEITH
Salem, Oregon

In the language Patentspeak (more precisely, its American dialect), every sentence or phrase is required to be the title of a patent issued by the United States Patent and Trademark Office. The number of issued U.S. patents is nearing the six million mark; nonetheless, Patentspeak is still a highly constrained language, due to the range of vocabulary available and the fact that patent titles are usually long phrases, not isolated words.

Although Patentspeak is fairly restrictive, to the experienced speaker it can be quite expressive. Here, for example, is a short dialogue from that famous primer The New Guide of the Conversation in Patentspeak and English, by Northo Carolino. First is Patentspeak, then in parenthesis, the English translation:

Method of and apparatus for providing a group query 5,485,605 (Hey, guys. How's it goin'?)

Methods and apparatus for acknowledging a paging message 5,526,401 (Well, we're still hanging in there. How about you?)

Weather forecasting watch 5,500,835 (Have you heard what it's gonna be like this weekend?)

Snow thrower 5,603,175 (Yeah. Lotsa white stuff, I hear)

Potty 5,535,456 (Crap!)

Charge status indicator 5,633,592 (Wanna hit the mall, or is your plastic maxed out?)

Waterproof money belt 5,540,366 (Are you kidding? I'm swimming in cash)

Computerized control of automobile speed 5,544,056 (Let's go, man. I'll drive!)

It is perfectly acceptable to add punctuation (or inflection, when speaking) in order to supply some additional expressiveness to the language. Note that true experts in Patentspeak can converse by just saying the seven-digit numbers, since there is a one-to-one correspondence between patent numbers and patent titles!
Should you wish to try your hand at composing in Patentspeak, a complete on-line "dictionary" of the language is provided--thanks to our tax dollars!--on the Patent Office website at www.uspto.gov. Simply click on "Patents", then "Search U.S. Patents", then "Advanced Search". You can then find all patents containing any combination of one or more words.

We end this article with a rendition of Edgar Allan Poe's "The Raven" in Patentspeak. It's interesting to speculate what a reader who was not familiar with the original would make of this; it clearly gains something by side-by-side comparison with Poe's poem. The line which pleases me the most is the pivotal first line of stanza 17 (perhaps the height of emotion in the whole poem) when the hero commands the bird to leave him, which is rendered as Patent #4,033,408: Go-devil storage and discharge assembly! Beside the verb discharge, which is after all what our hero is trying to do to the bird, we find the lovely, obscure, grammatically ambiguous term go-devil. This can be read as "Go, devil!" but of course it is actually a noun, usually referring to a ball or other device that's dropped into or propelled through a pipe. Many other lines repay further study by the prospective student of Patentspeak.

As an exercise, hop onto www.uspto.gov and try to rewrite Mary Had a Little Lamb. A quick check just now shows that there are 20 patent titles containing lamb and 51 including fleece, so the possibilities are there!
